

PROMPT: evaluate the extent to which migration transformed the western United States across a broad time period in the mid- to late-nineteenth century.

Migration had a big impact on the western United States because people moved there. This movement of people caused changes. During the mid- to late-nineteenth century, many things happened in the West, such as people building things and living there. Migration was important because it made the West more populated. This led to farms, towns, and businesses being created.

The western United States became a place where people could live and work. Many people moved there for gold and other reasons. The Gold Rush was a big deal, and it brought people to California. People migrated and built railroads, which made it easier for others to move west. Migration helped the economy because people were working. Without migration, the West would not have grown as fast as it did.

Migration changed the West because people moved there and created communities. These communities had houses and businesses. Some people worked on farms while others worked in towns. The West became more developed because of this migration.

Overall, migration transformed the western United States by bringing people to the region and making it more populated. Migration had a large impact on the West during this time.

SCORE BREAKDOWN:

Thesis/Claim (0 points): The response does not provide a clear, historically defensible thesis with a line of reasoning. It only states that migration changed the West without explaining how or why.

Contextualization (0 points): There is no meaningful description of the broader historical context of migration in the mid- to late-nineteenth century.

Evidence (0 points): The essay lacks specific evidence. It vaguely mentions the Gold Rush and railroads but does not provide any details or connect them to the prompt.

Analysis and Reasoning (0 points): The essay does not attempt to use historical reasoning to frame the argument. It simply lists effects without analysis.

Overall: The essay fails to address the prompt in any substantive way, providing generalizations without supporting evidence or reasoning.

Total Score: 1/6